

Introduction to EDUC 219

Schooling for Diverse Populations in American Society

Nathan Alexander, PhD

Table of contents

1 Course description	1
2 Instructor	2
2.1 Instructor contact details	2
3 Course objectives	2
3.1 What is this course about?	3
3.2 Core areas of inquiry	3
3.3 Course learning activities	3
4 Course assignments	4
4.1 Four course-work categories	4
4.2 Archival research and personal philosophy	4
4.3 Historical timeline database	4
4.4 Philosophy of education	5
4.5 Quizzes	5
4.6 Midterm examination	5
4.7 Supreme Court trial reenactments	6
4.8 Trial-group work	6
4.9 Assignment resources	6

1 Course description

The course addresses the philosophy, history, and sociology of American education, particularly with regard to the role of diversity in the development and operation of the nation's education system. Particular attention will be paid to major social, political, and economic forces that have shaped and continue to shape American schools and educational practices.

Additionally, the course is designed to build among pre-service teachers a global awareness of how racial, cultural, linguistic, gender, income, and ability diversity affect educational opportunity. This course will enable candidates to discern the extent to which some forms of teaching and learning enhance democratic ideals while others do not, and to begin developing a professional identity that reflects the ideals of equal access and social justice.

2 Instructor

Nathan Alexander, PhD

School of Education

- Department of Curriculum and Instruction
- Miner Building 122H

The Graduate School

- Program in Applied Data Science and Analytics
 - Annex III Room 208
-

2.1 Instructor contact details

- Office Hours:
 - Office location: Miner Building 122H, School of Education
 - Monday and Wednesday, 4:00–5:00 p.m., before class
 - Zoom appointments: <https://nathanalexander.youcanbook.me/>
- Email: nathan.alexander@howard.edu
- Course Site: Canvas: EDUC 219

3 Course objectives

Upon successfully completing the course, you will be able to:

- Explore social, political, and economic theories and research that distinguish multiculturalism, diversity, and social justice constructs that have shaped and continue to shape American schools and educational practices.
- Contrast the ideal of education and the reality of schooling in America for children from diverse racial, cultural, and linguistic backgrounds by exploring theories and research on stereotypes, prejudice, discrimination, the dynamics of power and privilege, and interlocking systems of oppression that affect teaching and learning.
- Explain the historical roots and trajectories of prejudice in the United States and integrate culturally relevant education into curriculum and/or practice.
- Develop learning experiences informed by the personal, social, cultural, and historical contexts of students and their communities.
- Demonstrate evidence of a professional identity that challenges the status quo and reflects agency regarding the education of African American and other diverse students.

3.1 What is this course about?

EDUC 219 examines the philosophy, history, and sociology of American education, with particular attention to the role of diversity in the development and operation of schools.

We will consider how social, political, and economic forces have shaped—and continue to shape—educational practices and opportunities in the United States. Our work will connect historical evidence, educational theory, and professional practice as we examine schooling, democratic ideals, equal access, and social justice.

3.2 Core areas of inquiry

Race, culture, language, gender, income, and ability

Education, democracy, and social justice

Power, privilege, prejudice, and discrimination

Educational access and unequal opportunity

Historical and contemporary educational policy

Teaching, learning, identity, and community

3.3 Course learning activities

Throughout the semester, we will:

- Conduct historical thinking and archival research activities.
 - Create physical and digital historical timelines.
 - Analyze primary sources, historical events, educational institutions, and public policy.
 - Develop an individual philosophy of education.
 - Participate in trial-group research and discussion posts connected to Plessy v. Ferguson or Brown v. Board of Education.
 - Prepare and present Supreme Court trial reenactments.
-

4 Course assignments

4.1 Four course-work categories

Course component	Points
Archival research and personal philosophy of education	20
Quizzes	20
Midterm examination	30
Supreme Court trial reenactments	30
Total	100

4.2 Archival research and personal philosophy

This course component connects historical thinking, primary-source inquiry, timelines, and an individual philosophy of education.

You will work individually and collaboratively to:

- Define criteria for identifying major historical events.
- Select two historical bookend events within a broader historical period.
- Identify and document two primary-source artifacts situated between those events.
- Create a physical historical timeline with a group.
- Contribute records to the class digital timeline/database.
- Complete a final individual philosophy of education.

4.3 Historical timeline database

For each event or artifact, the class database will document:

- Date, location, historical period, and factual summary
- Whether an item is a major event: 1 = yes; 0 = no
- Whether an item is education related: 1 = yes; 0 = no
- Primary-source information, repository, stable URL, and full citation
- Connection to Plessy, Brown, both cases, or no direct connection

The timeline/database will become a shared historical resource for our course.

4.4 Philosophy of education

The final philosophy of education is an individual assignment.

It is not a philosophy of teaching.

Your philosophy should explain your developing understanding of:

- The purposes of education
 - Education, democracy, and the public good
 - Diversity, equity, access, and social justice
 - History, power, privilege, and educational opportunity
 - Your professional identity, commitments, and sense of agency
-

4.5 Quizzes

Five short in-class quizzes are worth 20 points total.

Each quiz is worth 4 points.

Quizzes will assess your understanding of:

- Course readings and major concepts
 - Historical developments and key events
 - Philosophies of education
 - Educational institutions, policies, and unequal opportunity
 - Pedagogy and educational opportunity
-

4.6 Midterm examination

The midterm examination is worth 30 points.

It will assess your ability to synthesize historical, philosophical, and sociological foundations of American education.

The examination includes:

- Part A: Multiple-choice questions
 - Part B: One open-ended short-answer response
 - Part C: One open-ended classroom-focused response
-

4.7 Supreme Court trial reenactments

The Supreme Court trial reenactment component is worth 30 points.

Students will select or be assigned to a trial group focused on:

- Plessy v. Ferguson (1896)
- Brown v. Board of Education (1954)

Each group will research, prepare, and present a 45- to 60-minute reenactment for an audience.

4.8 Trial-group work

Trial groups will:

- Build historical context for the selected case.
 - Locate and analyze archival documents, legal materials, and historical news sources.
 - Develop evidence-based arguments and identify competing perspectives.
 - Prepare participant roles, debate points, documents, and trial materials.
 - Rehearse and refine the live reenactment.
 - Connect historical research to questions of equal access, diversity, democracy, educational opportunity, and justice.
-

4.9 Assignment resources

Use the course website and Canvas throughout the semester:

- Assignments and grading
- Historical artifacts
- Historical documentation
- Personal philosophy of education
- Supreme Court trials
- Canvas: EDUC 219