1 Module overview

This module brings together the historical, philosophical, sociological, legal, and pedagogical questions examined throughout EDUC 219. We will consider how pedagogy, curriculum, school structures, educational policy, and professional practice shape educational opportunity for students and communities.

The module asks students to connect the course's study of history, diversity, access, segregation, civil rights, and educational justice to present and future educational work. It also provides space to reflect on the trial reenactments, the final philosophy of education, and the continuing responsibilities of educators and educational professionals.

2 Guiding questions

- What is the relationship between pedagogy and educational opportunity?
- How do curriculum, instruction, assessment, discipline, and school organization shape students' access to meaningful learning?
- How can educators draw on students' histories, communities, languages, identities, and knowledge in culturally affirming ways?
- What can the histories of Plessy v. Ferguson and Brown v. Board of Education teach us about the relationship among law, schools, democracy, and social justice?

- How should educators respond to unequal histories and continuing inequalities in educational access and outcomes?
- What responsibilities do teachers, educational leaders, policymakers, families, and communities have for advancing educational justice?
- How has this course shaped your developing philosophy of education and professional identity?
